

Project Update: March 2008

The news from the field couldn't be most exciting. On our first trip to the highway, we could see that most of the natural habitat along the highway still conserved. We have also found a bear hunter, with 3 skins of spectacled bear at his house, right in front of the highway (see picture at the end of the text). The hunter said he killed the bears because they often eat corn from his corn plantation, which is located only one mile from the highway. There are other locals that are very familiar with the bears, especially loggers. We also found a local man, who have planted corn just to attract bears, so he can kill them to drink their blood, which he believes will make him stronger. A female bear with her cub is currently visiting his plantation. This is an excellent opportunity to study these animals. For this reason, I have changed a bit the plans and instead of having two groups of biologists traveling on the highway twice a month, one group will be in the field full time, while another will be traveling on the highway. The group that will be on the field will be getting data on our focal species, setting cameras and hair traps. Also, we have got a donation of a GPS collar and we are expecting to trap this bear, and set a GPS device on it, so we could follow its movements next to the highway. We are offering per diem for the bear hunters to work for us as a field guide. We expect to show them that they can make more profits showing tourists about bear biology in the field than planting corn.

We have made the questionnaires for the evaluation of local people knowledge about our focal species, in collaboration with students from local universities who are volunteering in the project. We have also advanced a bit with the educational material, and I am sending drafts at the end of this document for your appreciation.

I have also posted a website with detailed news from the project, with the goal to have local people engaged on it . We want to upload pictures of the local people working with us, so they can show to their friends and being proud to see themselves in the web. Little by little we expect to build conservation principles with local people. The link to the web site is below. It is in Spanish, but we are planning an English version soon. At least you can check for the pictures.
